I. Reading Comprehension

Most workers spend eight or nine hours on the job. They work because they need to make money. By contrast, there are some people who actually enjoy work and cannot stop working. In fact, they love to work. They spend many extra hours on the job each week and often take work home with them. These workaholics are addicted to their jobs as other people are to drugs or alcohol.

In urban areas, workaholism is so common that people do not consider it unusual: they accept the life style, as normal. Government workers, for example, frequently work fifty to sixty hours a week. If they do it because they have to, this is not a state of workaholism. Only when they do it because they want to, that we can locate a state of workaholism.

Workaholism, however, can be a serious problem. True workaholics do not know how to relax. Their lives are usually stressful and this tension can cause health problems.

Recent studies have shown that a large number of workaholics tend to fail in their marriages.

People have been studying earth and rock formations for a very long time. In the 19th century, geologists took a closer look at the layers that they saw in sedimentary rocks. They noticed that the rock tended to lie in horizontal sections that had different colors, textures, and fossils inside. Geologists called these layers of different rock types strata. They studied rock strata all around the world in order to figure out major events in geologic history. Over time, geologists and other scientists put all that information together to make the geologic time scale.
