Abstract

This research, entitled “The general and specific evidence in Grammatical Thought, A Study in Its Structural and Functional Values” attempted to monitor the deliberative function of the general and specific evidence, with its importance for the speaker and the receiver - like other grammatical evidences- in ensuring that the language performs its communicative function optimally, and to reveal the grammatical values that it plays in the structure of the installation, and its meanings, and the construction of grammar rules and its justification.

The research material required that it be located in an introduction, a preface, three sections and a conclusion. In the introduction, I talked about the importance of the topic, its approach. The preface is devoted to talking about the concept of the general and the specific, linguistically and idiomatically, their originality in grammatical thought, and their most important characteristics. In the first topic - the functional dimension of the “general and specific” evidence in grammatical thought, I discussed two issues: one of them: functional features in Arabic grammatical thought, and the other: the functional return of the “general and specific” evidence in the structure of the installation. In the second topic, I studied "the public and the specific" evidence as one of the paths of the cause, and in the third topic I explained that the public and the specific evidence is a manifestation of the flexibility of the Arabic language. Then followed by a conclusion that included the most important results included in the research.

Keywords: evidence - general - specific - thought - grammatical - functional.
